WIDOW UNDER A NEW MOON

Evening has overtaken the parlor. I cannot see my mother sitting on the porch, but I know exactly how she holds herself, knees tight against her chest.

There is the story
of my father and me
playing catch in the street.
We would throw high-flies to each other as dusk came on. In time,
we would not see the ball
until an instant
from our faces, when all luck was reflex.

Once—mighty—he threw
the ball to the moonless night, and I moved closer to him, gauging its point of return. There was a long pause, then her voice.

I get up from the rocker
and go to the door.
I ask her
if she'll be coming in soon, would
she like a cup of tea.
She does not answer
but asks
if we ever found the ball that night. I tell her what I have repeated
a thousand times. No, it must have landed
in a sewer or an open drain.

At this moment I am
slicing lemon for her tea.
I can hear her setting
china on the table,
the delicate clicks
freezing me in my place.
Soon she will take
a single taste of pie,
a few inaudible sips
of chamomile. Carefully, she will avoid my eyes.
Then, in strained monotone, she will claim
that he never believed the ball landed in the sewer, that he believed it was a sign.
I will place my cup
on the saucer
and inhale the sweet steam.
And tonight, finally,
perhaps I will say
yes, he might have been right and she will be gone.
