"We Are All Noah"

A FILM
BY TOM REGAN
PRODUCED BY KAY REIBOLD
(Available, Spring 1986)

"WE ARE ALL NOAH" explores the ethical teachings of Judaism and Christianity as they apply to various forms of human interaction with nonhuman animals. Among the forms considered are in science: the use of nonhuman animals in cosmetic and other toxicity testing in agriculture: intensive-rearing or close-confinement systems in factory farms in hunting: the traditions of sport and recreational hunting in trapping: the methods used to secure pelts for fur coats and related products in companion-animal relations: the numbers of unwanted companion animals killed in pounds and shelters, and sold to research facilities.

Representative thinkers from the Jewish and Christian religious communities respond to each form of interaction. The central questions discussed are

What should an informed, sensitive Jew or Christian think about how these animals are treated?

What should a responsible, compassionate Jew or Christian do in the face of this treatment?

"WE ARE ALL NOAH" does not offer simple answers to complex questions. Rather, it offers members of the Judeo-Christian religious communities an opportunity to understand what these questions are and why men and women of sincere convictions cannot avoid asking them, whatever their answer.

Like Noah of old, contemporary Jews and Christians must take responsibility for the fate of nonhuman animals, especially when their fate is determined by human decisions. This is the film's central message.
