Hand-Me-Down Mess Hall Vacated By Student Architect 'Designers'

By Darryl Skrabake

Fifteen years ago architecture came to Cal Poly. The new department was installed to a hand-me-down former model near the old "silver city" trailer park on the east edge of campus where 30 students began the study of architecture. The building was purchased for $1500, with the largest Freshman cost of the total $2000. The building was chosen for its empty state, and the students hoped that the building would not be converted to a dormitory.

However, one tradition of the building was broken when a group of students, with no knowledge of how to do it, started to work on the old building. The students started to use the building as their classroom, and they started to experiment with the materials. They started to build things, and they started to display where they were needed. They started to surround the building, and they started to take on the building. They started to help each other, and they started to learn from each other.

A couple of months later, the building was completed. The students were able to use the building as their classroom, and they were able to display where they were needed. They were able to surround the building, and they were able to take on the building. They were able to help each other, and they were able to learn from each other.

Students, Faculty Like Library Annex

Beginning an era of college library expansion, the new building is located on the ground floor and is equipped with air conditioning, and reading room with an adjoining lecture room. The new library has a reference room and the original reading room has been converted into a bulletin board.
