Old Poly never has been a province within a province. On the other hand it normally takes a pretty hot issue to arouse student concern. When something is so important to the enrollment quota plans this year it inevitably leaves several vacancies of just itself.

This fall the students have handled their protest in a commendable manner. Several protest organizations have prepared to make the protest a unified effort rather than pre-announced even for each group. In their protest plans, they plan to take the arguments to Student Affairs Council which is the correct body to handle student protests.

The recent student and faculty reaction to the enrollment plan brings to mind the need for some expression in the fall to handle student protests.

It's too bad it takes an issue like there was someone on the beach of 1%. There is hardly a better argument for using student planning to enforce a more definite and workable plan brings to mind the coed suspension issue in the fall to handle student protests.

Bagpippers Play Piobaireachd

As the sun set over the Highlands, the sound of the bagpipe filled the air, a traditional Scottish melody echoing through the winding roads. The players, dressed in traditional kilts and tartans, took to the stage, their fingers dancing across the keys of their instruments. The music was a symphony of pipes, a blend of ancient tones and modern flourishes.

This was no ordinary gathering; it was the Piobaireachd Society of America’s annual competition, held in honor of Scotland’s most famous songbook, the Great Western Collection. The competitors, all skilled players, gathered to showcase their abilities and honor the legacy of the Scottish bagpipe.

The contest began with the playing of "The Atholl Highlanders," a tune that set the tone for the evening. The players, each with their own unique style, took turns taking the stage. The atmosphere was electric as the audience hushed to listen to the music.

The soirées that followed were filled with traditional Scottish food and drinks, providing a taste of the culture and history that the bagpipe represents. The competition continued with the "Highland Bagpipe," a piece that highlighted the skill and passion of the players.

As the night wore on, the final competition took place, featuring the "March the First of May." The players gave their all, pushing the limits of their instruments and their own abilities. The audience was captivated, cheering and applauding as the last note sounded.

The evening ended with a final tribute to the late Sir James Wallace Marsden, a pipemaker who had dedicated his life to preserving the art of the Scottish bagpipe. The audience stood, their hearts filled with admiration for the skill and dedication of the players.

End of the evening, the bagpipe music faded into the distance, but the memories of the Piobaireachd competition would linger long. The tradition of the Scottish bagpipe lived on, a testament to the enduring love and appreciation of this ancient art form.
