The delegation is headed by He Jiadong, chief of the Education Division, Science and Education Bureau of the Chinese Agricultural Commission.

The group’s visit to the U.S. was arranged through the World Bank of China project in cooperation with the Consortium for International Cooperation in Higher Education headquartered in Washington D.C.

CSUC is now CSU

The country's largest system of senior higher education has become "The California State University" as the result of legislation passed in 1981.

The legislation removed the words "and Colleges" from the name the system has had since 1972, "The California State University and Colleges."

Names of the 19 campuses will not be affected, as they comprise a statewide system that will continue to include college campuses in addition to the 16 institutions qualified to have "university" as part of their titles under Board of Trustees and California Postsecondary Education Commission criteria.

"CSU" will become the new short-form reference to the system's name. The name change eliminates the unusual dichotomy of a singular "university" and plural "colleges" from the system's designation of the past 10 years.

Innovative designs on display

The late Louis I. Kahn was considered by his peers to be a visionary architect and environmental designer. Through Friday (Feb. 6) an exhibit of his models and drawings is being shown before being returned to the archives at the University of Pennsylvania. The exhibit, titled "Windows to Form," is on display in the University Union Galerie. The public is invited.

Louis Isadore Kahn was born in 1901 on the Baltic island of Saarama in Estonia, now a part of the Soviet Union. In 1906, he emigrated to Philadelphia where from 1920 to 1924, he studied architecture at the University of Pennsylvania.

Kahn's early buildings were considered undistinguished. From 1947 through 1957, he taught at Yale University, where he acquired the reputation as a theorist. During this period, he designed the Yale University Art Gallery, which showed the beginnings of his later innovative architectural ideas.

In 1957, Kahn returned to the University of Pennsylvania, where he taught until his death in 1974. Among the important buildings he designed are the Library at Philip's Exeter Academy, the National Assembly Hall in Dacca, Bangladesh, the Salk Institute for Biological Studies, coupled with the Salk Institute Community Center, the Kimball Art Museum, and the Yale Center for British Art and Studies.

Among his unrealized (as yet) structures were the Palazzo dei Congressi in Venice, a synagogue in Philadelphia, the President's estate in Pakistan, and a memorial to the victims of the Nazi holocaust in New York's Battery Park.
