Madness followed him home

by John Fitzhugh

A cluster of bivouacs, several miles beyond the settlement where the highway ended, were built of snow, wire and sand. They were the homes of the men who had come there to work on the pipeline.

The men were building a tunnel under the snow, using pickaxes and shovels. The tunnel was part of a network of tunnels that would eventually stretch from one side of the country to the other, providing a means of transport for goods and people.

As they worked, the men talked about their families, their homes, and their dreams of what they would do once they finished the work. They were all young men, full of energy and determination.

The tunnels were like their own worlds, separate from the harsh reality of the world above. They were isolated, but not alone. They were part of a community, working together to create something greater than any one of them could have accomplished alone.

The tunnels eventually linked together, forming a web of connections. They were a symbol of the power of human cooperation, of what we can achieve when we work together.

In the end, the tunnels were completed, and the men returned to their homes, carrying with them a sense of accomplishment and a new sense of what they were capable of.
