The promise of a new library on campus is good news for most of us, but bad news for the Cal Poly Children's Center.

The Children's Center will be vacated to accommodate a new library, which has been approved by Gov. Brown. The buildings north of the present library—architecture and child development offices and labs—will also be run down or relocated.

The Children's Center staff members are worried about the move.

"All of us who work here are afraid," said Donnaban, who has been informed it must vacate the building by the end of fall quarter. At this point, no one is sure where they will go.

The administration has requested information as to the state requirements from the center.

"We are right in the middle of resolving the problem and we don't have all the answers yet," Dean Gerard said. "I have assured Prov. Kennedy and the Board of Directors of the Children's Center that the center will be retained. There are no details worked out yet and probably won't be until October."

In the mean time, the Children's Center must wait to know their future.

"We really aren't informed and that's why we're afraid," Donnaban said.

Forty-five families are enrolled in the day care program with a long list of people waiting to get in. Students have priority over faculty members and students with low incomes have top priority.

"Our main concern now is just, please, give us a space that is adequate for our children," Nita Kenyon, parent and member of the Board of Directors said.

The Children's Center will be vacated by the end of fall quarter. At this point, no one is sure where they will go.
