Panetta pushes youth volunteer legislation

By Lorrie Smith

Several local groups could benefit from a proposed federal program that would match grants for state and local youth volunteer service organizations.

The program was the subject of a House subcommittee hearing in Washington, D.C., on June 30. Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Monterey) was among those who gave testimony for the proposed youth-service bill.

A spokesman for Panetta, Barry Toy, said Panetta's main goal is to "encourage and provide the opportunity for youths to serve the community and their fellow citizens; to give them a sense of responsibility and accomplishment."

Programs that would benefit from the proposal can address social or environmental issues. The programs must serve the community and provide certain qualifications for volunteers.

These qualifications include fixed pay, housing, or other assistance and post-service benefits for volunteers such as educational assistance and job subsidies.

The body which decided on how lottery money would be divided, the Instructional Program Resource Advisory Committee, based its allocations on three main criteria: the merit of each proposal requiring funds, the number of students who would benefit and the quality of the programs needing funding.

The reason those two schools got the biggest chunks of the pie, Lebenn said, is that each must fund programs in which students can produce music electronically.

"It came at the right time," said Cliffon Swanson, music department head. "It came at the right time."

The music department received $57,000. The department will use the money to buy a portable electronic music lab, in which students can produce music electronically.

"The lottery grant has enabled our department to purchase something we could never afford to do ourselves," said Cliffon Swanson, music department head.

Poly splits lottery money between seven schools, ASI

By Lisa Bodo

The Instructional Program Resource Advisory Committee evaluated 121 proposals submitted by the schools. Thirty-seven proposals were granted full or partial funding.

"We realize that many things were needed," said Glez. Irvin, associate vice president for academic affairs. "But when the proposals amounted to over $3.5 million and we were given $500,000 to work with, some proposals had to be cut."

"We're in no way trying to slice the pie between seven schools," said Assistant Vice President for Academic Resources Frank Lebens.

"When the National Science Foundation, which has financially supported the lab from the beginning, heard we had received the lottery money, they stepped in, giving us $80,000 to work with," said Sawant Rijal, an architectural engineering professor.

"The music department received $57,000. The department will use the money to buy a portable electronic music lab, in which students can produce music electronically."

"The lottery grant has enabled our department to purchase something we could never afford to do ourselves," said Cliffon Swanson, music department head.

Merchant complains of smoke

By Barbara Cunningham

The merchant, Aim Real, said he is unable to continue his business because his barbecue was being damaged by smoke from Mason's barbecue pits at Farmers' Market. But before making his decision, Aim also attended several BIA meetings because the business improvement association issues and controls the spaces given to vendors Thursday night.

"There is no request for dam-ages, just relief from the smoke," said Randall Cook, Aim's lawyer.

Aim's ultimate goal through his suit was to have Mason's barbecue moved at least 50 feet from the front of his store.

Aim realized months before his June 25 opening that smoke would be a problem. He sent a letter April 10 to Mason asking him to barbecue further down the street. Aim also attended several BIA meetings because the association issues and controls the spaces given to vendors Thursday nights.

The Architectural Engineering Department will get about $40,000 to upgrade its seismic lab. The lab enables students to test earthquake's effects on buildings.

This quarter my history class has been applying the concept of "illusion and reality" to Cal Poly and have tried to answer the question, "Does Cal Poly reflect the world it supposedly represents?" The only question is, "Does Cal Poly reflect the outside world is supposedly represented?" The only answer I have is no.

In this case, the outside world is California and we are a state-supported school that supposedly represents its demographics. But look around the campus. I doubt it can be justified that the percentage of blacks, hispanics, native Americans, disabled and other nontraditional groups are comparable to the rest of the CSU campuses, let alone the state. So, big deal. What harm can it do if Cal Poly is primarily made up of white, upper-middle-class males?

I do not think that you can win any harm is in its per se. But most of us are here for four, five and if we are here just for English classes, six years. Cal Poly becomes our temporary world in which we learn, live and associate, maybe we can change our value structure to fit the experiences we have at Cal Poly. And after we graduate and build a life and a society unlike that which we experienced here, our value structure may not fit.

I firmly believe that Cal Poly needs more minority representation on campus if not to represent the state, at least to help students experience a society like that which lies outside our 5,000 acres. But at the same time, I firmly believe the school should admit only the most qualified applicants. Still, most of the time these applicants are not minorities. Why?

It's been shown that some minorities are not as prepared for college as other people are. It's not the fault of minorities. The problem is which they may be deprived of quality education. They shouldn't be deprived of a college education? I don't believe. That brings us to the question: does Cal Poly improve its under-represented population, while at the same time uphold its tradition of admitting "the cream of the crop," knowing that most of these minority students usually don't fit that mold? I believe we must do what other campuses have done. We should isolate and actively recruit these under-represented students who have the potential to be outstanding students at Cal Poly.

It was noted in my class that another university in our state has given scholarships to those minority students whom they feel have the potential to succeed. We don't have the financial resources they have, but I believe we should follow their example. I know that Cal Poly is doing its best to recruit these types of students to our campus. No one can doubt that it's not only tough to get into our school, it's sometimes a struggle to stay a part of it. That only makes the recruitment effort tougher. I admit, I know it's a difficult and touchy subject, and under no circumstances do I believe we should recruit and admit any under-represented student just for the sake of having "a better minority pool."
Ribs, ribs and more ribs

By Coleen Bondy, staff writer

THE AROMA OF BARBECUED RIBS filled the air. Hungry stomachs were set to growling by the hickory scent of crackling fat mixed with a special sauce, dripping into an open fire. The lucky ones were already smearing their fingers and faces with the greasy ribs, savoring every bite and trying to remember what the last rib tasted like in comparison.

The scene? Not a Stephen King horror story. It was San Luis Obispo's fifth annual rib cook-off, sponsored by the Business Improvement Association. Six restaurants competed for two trophies, one decided by the people's votes and the other by a panel of six judges. Nothing But The Best took the judge's choice trophy and, once again, the people chose Old Country Deli.

Would the winners care to share their secret?

"No," was the reply of a representative of Nothing But The Best. He said, however, "The secret is the people; the people who work for us, the people who come out every (Thursday) night."

Still doesn't make for much of a recipe. Apparently, the winners are guarding their secrets well in order to beat the competition next year.

The six judges who gave their time and taste buds to the effort were Mike McCartney and Pete Magnusson of KSBY-TV, Vice Mayor Robert Griffin, Betsy Camp of KCBX, Ken Dyar of The County Telegram-Tribune, musician Mary McGregor and County Supervisor Carl Hysen.

World-class opera singer shares talent with students

By Nishan Havanjian
Special to the Mustang

SHE IS HAILED as one of the finest Mozart singers of her generation, and opera house managers from Milan, to Paris, London, and New York clamor for her services.

For one week, participants in CSU's Summer Arts Festival can benefit from Carol Vaness' interpretative insights in the opera masterclasses she is conducting here.

Vaness, a tall, vivacious, down-to-earth woman in her mid-thirties is still recuperating from a bad case of jet lag. Having just concluded performing at the Paris Opera Comique in Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito on July 17, she took the next plane out to Los Angeles.

"I was getting sick and tired doing La Clemenza, so for selfish reasons I immediately accepted coming to Poly," she said. That gives her opportunity to rehearse with David Scott, opera and voice head at Northridge, see her family in Los Angeles and above all work with promising young people at the threshold of promising careers, she said.

Opera stars who conduct masterclasses are usually those in their waning years who still enjoy name recognition and whose so-called teaching sessions become media events. Vaness said she brings to her task at Poly recent experiences on the international scene where she debuted around 1982.

"Some of the apprentice singers in the summer program are close to my age and I can see..."

The Challenge

Story by April Karys
Photos by Floyd Jones and April Karys

I ran, covered by my camarades’ fire, so the entrance of a tunnel and checked inside for signs of ambush. Finding none, I crawled into the earth like a frightened rabbit.

I stopped to let the dust settle, then wavered to crawl beneath the village under which this burrow led. Tapes: the red flag hanging at the well where the tunnel would eventually end. I came to a corner, held my gun around it and shot. Then, to make sure, I fired again.

"Stop already. I’m hit!" cried an irritated member of the other team. He crawled out of the tunnel covered with red paint and lamenting.

Seconds later I, too, would be splattered with the water-soluble pain and was out of the game. No matter; we had already captured the flag.

When I went to Central Coast Challenge in the back hills of Santa Maria I didn’t expect to have fun. What I did expect was that I would be surrounded by war veteran and ROTC-type men who would be obviously gunning for competitive and formatting. Instead I met several interesting, fun-loving people, in tunnels and a base camp with trenches and more than 300 sand bags. We wanted to make it as realistic as possible.

Capturing the other team’s flag and returning it to your own team’s camp is the goal of the game. Players are equipped with goggles, a face mask, a colored armband, a camouflaged air gun, two tubes of paint balls, two carbon dioxide cartridges and a flag to wave if hit. The air guns have an accurate range of about 110 feet.

The players are divided into two teams and a game is chosen. In this day’s game there were too few people to use both the base camp and the village, so one team was stationed inside the village to defend the flag and the other was to attack.

"It’s like a kid game of cops and robbers," said Bouslaugh, who also runs a private investigation firm in Santa Maria. "It lets you kind of regress and just have fun, except with the paint you can’t argue about whether or not you’ve been hit."

"It’s all in fun," Massa said during one game. "This is how disputes should be settled. Just have a game and no one gets hurt."

"This is how disputes should be settled — just have a game and no one gets hurt."

We don’t have much trouble with Rambo types," said Bouslaugh, also Veteran of the Vietnam War. "It’s a gentlemen’s game. Most people don’t argue when they get hit, they just declare themselves out and leave the field."

Bob Sparky, the deliberate, quiet third founder of Central Coast Challenge, played for part of the day and officiated for the rest. The big National Guardsman, an airborne ranger during Vietnam, especially liked to go down into the tunnels after infiltrators from the other team.

Educating the public about the game is a future goal of the three, said Bouslaugh. He said they would like to show slides to different groups in an effort to "dispel the myth of guys trying to be soldiers."

"The only reason players wear cammies is that it’s good camouflage," he said. "It just happens to be military as well."

Central Coast Challenge is not the most inexpensive way to spend the day, but every player out that day agreed that the fun is definitely worth the price.

"Look at how else you spend money," said Dave McCool of Vandenberg AFB. "You can go into a bar and drop $20, easy."
"The first question I asked Beverly Sills was 'how do you control your nerves?' Her answer: 'Why should I have nerves?'" Vaness conceded that being too relaxed about one's art during a performance may not work either. She termed her approach as controlled nervousness. "I found that the times I haven't been nervous at all I haven't sung well," she said.

Vaness said the Cal State system abounds with vocal talent. Her approach in her masterclasses at Poly is to instill in the students that singing is according to a well-worked plan. "Singing is not a mystery," she said. "You have to practice your technique, learn what you are as a person and inject that into your music and be able to control your nerves and fear." She is not her job to tell students whether they have a chance for a career or not. "If they ask me in private I can be ruthless. When I auditioned for bass George London he told me to forget it and go to musical comedy," she said.

Professionally she is sailing from one triumph to another. After her teaching stint at Poly she is due for more phenomenalism in London, then comes her first solo album of Verdi arias for the Virruo label. Later she is slated for engagements which will test her suitability for bel canto roles such as Donizetti's Anna Bolena and Rossini's Mois. She has worked with all the great operatic conductors with the exception of Giulini, Abbado and Soh, "I may work with Solti soon," she said.

She views her California visits as returns to normalcy. "When I am in LA I feel like a normal person who has friends and family and who can sleep ten hours a day," she said. On August 25 she will become a normal bride testing the waters of her first marriage. Will she sacrifice art for love? "You bet I won't. My husband wants me to have a career. I've cancelled engagements before because of a man. Not any more. There are a lot of men in the world," she said.

Vaness will perform in recital at the Cal Poly Theatre at 8 p.m. tonight. The program consists of songs and arias by Rossini, Strauss, Puccini, Barber, Duparc, Chausson and Faure. Ticket prices: $5 general, $3 for students.

Act requires employees to show proof of citizenship

By Stephanie Dias

FUTURE AND some present employees of Cal Poly will have to show evidence of U.S. citizenship or permission to work here, according to federal legislation passed in 1986. Because of the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) new employees, including students and lecturers hired after Nov. 6 of last year, will be required to prove citizenship and work eligibility by driver's license, social security number or green card. Future employees will have three days after they are hired to provide this information.

"The IRCA prevents unauthorized workers from taking jobs from those who are. It is designed to provide a U.S. work force," said Carol Clifford of the payroll office.

Employees will be asked to sign a 1-9 form which verifies their work eligibility. Employees then have six months, until Oct. 27, to send in the form and meet the IRCA employment requirements, according to a College and University Personnel Association report. The process will be repeated every three years.

Employees who fail to comply with these requirements can be fined from $100 to $1,000 per employee.

The law has not greatly affected Cal Poly because many of the employees fulfill the IRCA requirements, Clifford said.

"A lot more paper work has been created, but it is in the interest of the public," she said.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service is responsible for enforcing the IRCA law.

paid and technically are not volunteers, this organization would still be eligible for funding.

Larry Hand, a spokesman for the CCC, said the proposed funding could "significantly expand my service in the North and South County." He added that the CCC, with the extra funding, could employ more people and add more resources and services to the community.

The local United Way would also benefit from the proposed funding, a spokesperson for the organization said. If the chapter receives funding, most of the money would be used for staff increases. Staff increases would, in turn, relieve many volunteers of some responsibility and allow them to serve the community better, the spokesperson added.

Mason agreed to move, and the BIA offered him a space at the far end of the Network property, about 75 feet from Aim’s store. Mason also agreed to use one barbecue pit instead of two, which would cut the amount of smoke in half.

Aim is pleased to have reached a compromise, but the case isn’t officially settled. He said the real test will be at tonight’s Farmers’ Market where the effects of the compromise can be seen.

If the compromise doesn’t work, then Aim said he will be forced to continue his legal battle and seek damages for the clothes he can’t sell. So far Aim has been willing to swallow the cost of his damaged sportswear. But if the smoke continues to get into his store, Aim said that as a businessman he will have no choice but to seek payment for damages to his merchandise.

“...I can’t sell clothes that smell like they’ve been worn to a picnic...” he said.
