Dean leaves to take post in Arizona

By Jackie Jones

Because of his interest in primary education, William Boyes, dean of the School of Business, has resigned from his position at Cal Poly.

Boyes came to Cal Poly in July 1991 from Arizona State University in Tempe. He left less than a year later, in late June, to return to ASU as a professor responsible for developing the school's Free Enterprise Institute, a project supporting research programs.

"Going back to the classroom looked very attractive to Dr. Boyes," said Mary Beth Armstrong, the acting interim dean of the School of Business. "He seemed to like the teaching aspect more than the administrative aspect."

At ASU, Boyes will have the opportunity to explain the importance of research to kindergarten through 12th-grade students. He wanted to connect with students in primary education and encourage interest in research, Armstrong said.

Boyes' department head of Business Administration. But also an author and consultant. He not only a teacher and administrator, but also an author and consultant.

Poly cuts admissions as it preps to ax 1,000 students

By Julie Pacheco

By the end of the 1992-93 academic year, the Cal Poly administration plans to have cut enrollment by 1,000 students, including eliminating 1993 winter and spring admissions.

"The budget cuts have shrunk the size of the faculty here, and we would rather cut enrollment than courses," said Walter Mark, director of Institutional Studies.

"Even with cuts, the student-to-teacher ratio will not be what it was two years ago," Mark said. "Enrollment would have to be reduced by 2,200 students to make the student-to-teacher ratio sufficient."

The ideal ratio of 16 students to one teacher hasn't been in effect since the 1990-91 academic year, Mark said. The projected ratio for fall quarter is 22 students to one teacher.

The question facing Cal Poly students is how the administration plans to eliminate 1,000 students.

"One way we plan to cut enrollment is by strictly adhering to the disqualification rules outlined in the Cal Poly catalog," Mark said.

Retired public official joins City Council race

By Jackie Jones

John Cristofano

Retired Public Works Director David F. Romero announced his candidacy for the San Luis Obispo City Council Wednesday, saying that it is "critical to have good relations between students and the city government."

Romero, dressed in a navy blue suit, pink shirt and colorful floral tie, made his announcement at the Mission Plaza. He said that his decision to run for City Council was based on his "great love for the community."

Romero, 63, said his decision was also based largely on the "conviction that city policies in recent years have been shortsighted and have detracted rather than added to the quality of life we all value in San Luis Obispo."

Romero, a former part-time engineering lecturer at Cal Poly, said the university is the key city employer and that housing issues are directly related to students.

"Students are vital in our community," he said. "We have to work closely with them."

"I think I can represent students well," Romeros added. "And anytime I can meet with students, I would love to do it."

On local issues, Romero said he is a strong advocate of state water. "I believe all water sources are critical to the city," he said.

Romero also said he is in favor of limited city growth. He explained that the enrollment direction of Cal Poly, more than to eliminate 1,000 students.

Man dies in campus library

By Jackie Jones

Michael Sheats

A man believed to be a Cal Poly graduate suffered a cardiac arrest at the Kennedy Library Sunday afternoon and later died, according to Chief Leroy Whitmer of Public Safety's fire department.

Cal Poly police and fire received a call from the circulation desk around 3:50 p.m. Sunday. When they arrived one minute later, the emergency medical team began CPR until an ambulance arrived.

The ambulance team took the man to Sierra Vista Hospital where he was later pronounced dead, Whitmer said.

The man's name was not disclosed by the coroner's office by press time because the next of kin had not been contacted.

No other details about the incident could be confirmed by press time.

AMMAN, Jordan (AP) — King Hussein, increasingly squeezed by U.S.-led efforts to strengthen Saddam Hussein's regime, says he will not be pressured into allowing U.N. observers into Jordan to prevent strategic materials from reaching Baghdad.

U.S. officials have accused Jordan of turning a blind eye to smuggling across Jordan's desert border with Iraq. Officials have said about 20 percent of the smuggled goods are used by Iraq to rebuild its war-shattered infrastructure and strengthen the beleaguered regime of President Saddam Hussein.

"We will not be treated as suspects ... who are in need of observation and supervision," King Hussein told The Associated Press on Tuesday in an exclusive interview in the Basman palace overlooking Jordan's capital.

The United States has proposed stationing up to 50 observers in Jordan to monitor the flow of goods into Iraq, but King Hussein and his parliament have rejected the offer, saying it would violate Jordan's sovereignty.

Canadian leaders agree on special treatment for Quebec

OTTAWA (AP) — Seeking to halt Quebec's secessionist drive, the federal government and premiers from the nine English-speaking provinces have agreed to the Francophone region's demands for special treatment.

The measures, which are part of a wide-ranging constitutional reform plan reached late Tuesday, appear to address all the major points of dispute between Quebec and the other provinces.

The package still must be approved by federal and provincial lawmakers across the nation, including Quebec, which boycotted the negotiations. It was not immediately clear when the package would be put to a vote.

However, Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa is still required to hold a provincial referendum by Oct. 26 on autonomy for Quebec.

Many officials, however, were optimistic the accord will end Canada's constitutional crisis.

Environmental group joins GM to cut vehicle emissions

NEW YORK (AP) — The environmental group that helped McDonald's shrink its mountain of discarded hamburger wrapping has joined General Motors to find ways to cut car emissions that can lead to urban smog and global warming.

The outcome of the program could be radically new pollution-trading proposals in which utilities might find it cheaper to pay General Motors to make electric cars than to cut their own emissions, said one of the architects of the new alliance, Joseph Goffman of the Environmental Defense Fund.

"It could well work the other way, that to get the next reduction out of automobiles is incredibly expensive, and maybe it makes sense for GM to pay utilities to reduce emissions," Goffman said.

Los Angeles Commission recommends changes in L.A.'s smog rules

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A commission recommended that anti-pollution rules in the nation's smoggiest region be changed to more strongly reflect the region's economic needs.

The commission also recommended that the AQMD appoint an ombudsman for those it regulates.

Businesses have long complained that smog rules are cumbersome and reduce their profits, costing jobs in the region.

The Special Commission on Air Quality and the Economy, composed of business representatives, city officials and environmentalists, based its finding on a series of public hearings that were mainly attended by business people.

San Francisco mayor admits to rough six months in office

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Self-styled "citizen mayor" Frank Jordan acknowledged Wednesday that he's had a rough time since taking office six months ago. But he says he's growing into the job.

In a progress report issued six months to the day from his Jan. 8 inauguration, Jordan said he needs more time to fulfill the promises he made during his successful campaign as a City Hall outsider.

He also alluded to the headline-grabbing controversies that have plagued him from the very start of his term — problems that contributed to his low approval rating in a recent voter poll.

But Jordan told reporters he'll keep plugging away to trim fiscal excesses, make the streets safer and cleaner and attack the city's homeless problem.

"I have not met all my personal goals as mayor," Jordan said. "We have, however, established our priorities, and we are moving forward."
PolySCOPE reorganizes, looks ahead to fall quarter

John Cristofano
Staff Writer

For San Luis Obispo City Council candidate Brent Petersen and the student coalition that endorses him, judgment day is Nov. 3 — election day. Although that’s almost four months away, Petersen and polySCOPE are not taking it easy over the summer months. Petersen, who won polySCOPE’s endorsement via a primary in May, said that he is “working laboriously at this time.”

“T’m talking with a lot of people,” Petersen said. He said that most recently he met with David Blinkely, a county supervisor. Petersen said such meetings “allow me to get my name out and provide me with the opportunity to learn as much as possible about the issues.”

The political science senior also said he also plans to “spend a lot of time going through last year’s city budget.” He explained that this would help him learn how the city allocates its resources.

In addition, Petersen said he will research the effect the state will have on San Luis Obispo. He said he will try to discover “where the city will get its revenues in the future to maintain the agencies and programs that are going on now.”

Many of Petersen’s objectives will be met with the assistance of polySCOPE, although he is quick to point out that the student coalition isn’t part of his campaign; it simply endorses him.

“I have my own campaign, and polySCOPE is separate from that,” Petersen said. “They are simply an important resource to get students to register and vote, hopefully for me.”

PolySCOPE Vice-Chair Mike Rockenstein agreed with Petersen.

“PolySCOPE has given (Petersen) the endorsement,” Rockenstein said. “We aren’t actually voting out to campaign for him, but we are going to support him.”

Rockenstein said polySCOPE’s primary objectives are to inform students about issues and mobilize students to vote.

“Second to those (objectives) is to help endorse my candidacy,” Petersen added.

Rockenstein explained that during the fall quarter polySCOPE will “essentially make preparations for the fall.” He said that this would first contact volunteers involved during spring quarter, “just to find out who’s here and still interested in helping.”

Rockenstein said this process would not set polySCOPE back.

“PolySCOPE’s endorsement is that (the referendum) should be left up to the people to decide, and the city is doing what it can to make the referendum happen,” Rockenstein said. “It’s something we deeply care about, so we’ll get the money we need somehow,” Kranzdorf said.

Jorgensen said the county flood district has imposed a Dec. 1 deadline for the issue to be resolved, otherwise the district is proposing to withdraw San Luis Obispo’s acceptance of state water.

“Jorgensen said he believes the district will be lenient if a court decision is near. Kranzdorf seemed certain the deadline won’t be enforced.

“It’s never over until it’s over,” Kranzdorf said. “It wouldn’t be the first deadline to slip, especially with new people coming into office in November.”

City Council candidate Brent Petersen says he is talking with officials and doing other research for his campaigns.

SLO to go to court over state water referendum

Brenda Lynn Mills
Staff Writer

The City Council waded into a rather muddy water issue June 30 by voting to put state water on the ballot, a private citizen, Ray Ball, filed a lawsuit in Superior Court.

As a result, the state water issue is now out of the council’s hands, and a judge will decide whether the matter can legally be put to a vote.

The city is hoping that arrangements for a court date can be made by July 30, City Clerk Pam Voges said.

Ball is not alone in his belief that the referendum should be challenged in court.

City Attorney Jeff Jorgensen, concerned over the issues, asked whether state water is even subject to referendum, stated that it may even be illegal to place it on the November ballot after the council voted for state water.

“The real question is whether the council’s decision to participate in the State Water Project was an administrative or legislative decision,” Jorgensen said.

If it was administrative, he said, it is not subject to referendum. But if it was legislative, it is subject to a public vote.

Jorgensen said a referendum can’t be held in this instance because it was referred to the council but was not administrative. He explained that these responsibilities have given him “a unique understanding of city operations and current and future needs.”

Four other candidates have announced that they will run for the two open positions on the City Council.

They are: Cal Poly political science senior Brent Petersen, retired teacher John Lybarger, former Downtown Business Improvement Association administrator Dodie Williams and Cuesta College student David Rockenstein.

The filing period for the election begins June 13 and ends Aug. 7.
I stood in the long line, staring at the hole in my shoe. The bottoms of my feet were burning from the heated ground beneath them, yet I did not complain.

My gaze slowly shifted to the vast number of people who surrounded me. Children, women and men and dads quietly talked. Couples clung to one another beneath the hot sun, laughing, teasing, and kissing each other as if they were in the privacy of their own homes.

But they weren't. They stood amongst a thousand strangers, in the midst of a swarm of people that wound in and out and around the painted blue railings.

I sighed heavily, wondering if we were close. We'd been waiting in line for more than 30 minutes, and had reached the entrance to the dark tunnel that would lead us to our final destination.

Like an annoying child on a long family vacation, I wanted to tap the shoulder of the guy in front of me and ask, "How much longer?"

Perhaps it sounds more like torture than pleasure, but the truth is that I, like thousands of others, paid to be there. And chances are that thousands more will do it today, and every day that follows. After all, for the small price of $29.50, you, too, can purchase a ticket to The Happiest Place on Earth: Disneyland.

The happiest place on earth? Yeah, right. Long lines, endless hours, queue- and over-priced, half-cooked food were never quite my idea of true happiness. Yet after my most recent trip into the Magic Kingdom, I may have finally changed my opinion. Maybe, just maybe, Disneyland IS the happiest place on earth!

It is a place where the streets are clean, and the people friendly. It is a place where passers-by, with the exception of the four-year-old boy crying over a dropped popsicle, appear content. It is a place where fantasy becomes reality, and reality becomes seemingly nonexistent.

Where else could you go to find just about every employee happy and helpful? Such a characteristic can rarely be found in businesses today. And these exemplary employees are not clothed in your average business garb... these are grown men and women whose uniforms range from raccoon suit to Star Trek-like spacesuits to green polyester elf outfits!

The men were commissioned for a job well done. The whole theme of Disneyland is, after all, based on fantasy. And when the employees appear to believe in the unbelievable, it becomes contagious.

A perfect example of this was my voyage through Storybookland (Yes, Storybookland -- a creative name, indeed). During the ride, I shared a boat with about 10 adults, including our tour guide. Her name was Megan, and I swear she was The Happiest Person on Earth.

As we floated through the murky green water, Megan told us of Pinocchio's creation, and shared with us as a story how he blew up a whale.

With a delicate gesture of her hand and a pointed finger, she showed us where the Three Little Pigs lived, and briefly retold their tale.

"Were we supposed to believe all this?" By the tone in her voice and the smile on her face, you could easily draw the conclusion that she believed every word she spoke.

Yet I knew it wasn't true. The man seated next to me knew it wasn't true. And deep, deep, down inside, I think even Megan knew it wasn't true. But it had entertainment value, and as I looked at the faces of the other passengers, I noticed that everyone was smiling...even me.

I began to realize that it was not the "scary" rides that I enjoyed so much as the "tamer" rides. For instance, I sailed with the Pirates of the Caribbean which has always been one of my favorite attractions, largely because it's indoors and much cozier than others.

But this time as I sat in that small boat to take the two-minute voyage into the past, I was in awe of the talent and creativity required to make something like that work. I left the ride smiling.

We also went to listen to the Country Bear Jamboree, something I had never done, and which seemed utterly corny...a sort of upgraded version of a Chuck E. Cheese attraction.

But as I sat on one of the long, hard wooden benches and the country bears did their thing, everyone in the audience began clapping, and some were even singing along. Although I didn't join in, I once again left the building smiling.

Was it a "happy" ride? Was I having a good time in the hot sun? Had I overlooked the over-priced food?

The answers are yes. As corny as it may seem, the fact is that it was during the "boring" attractions that I saw the real beauty of Disneyland: its unique ability to make real the fantasy, and turn fiction into fact.

A "happy" time I did have. My only suggestion for Walt's successors would be that they lower the admission fee.

After all, everyone should be able to afford to smile — without fully comprehending why — every now and then.

Workers should cut the cat-calls

When I wrote the check for my registration fees for the summer quarter, I thought I knew what I was paying for. I paid for the Health Center, the free bus and the salaries of the teachers.

What I did not bargain for was to be the recipient of cat-calls and whistles from some of the men who work for the

S&A/Continental Heller Construction Co.

I walk by the construction site next to the outdoor pool on my way to school. It is the easiest and most convenient way for me to go.

On more than one occasion, I have been whistled at and called to. One of those occasions, I was walking with my boyfriend, and one of the workers yelled, "That's my girl!"

I was shocked and uneasy; I then asked my boyfriend if he was going to stand for that? I realized that it is not his responsibility but my own.

I did not ask this construction worker to comment on my boyfriend or me. I am disappointed that these men feel they have the right to comment freely on it.

At that particular moment, I might have been thinking about classes assignments or my plans for the evening.

Within an instant, I realized that my boyfriend was not the only one aware of my body, my physical shell that has nothing to do with my mind or my ideas.

This comment and type of behavior is simply unkind for its functions to reinforce the stereotype commonly held of construction workers: that that they are a bunch of illiterate, grunting ape men who cannot control their primary urges.

There is a point in development when we learn not to utter every thought or to act on every impulse. I believe this process begins in the early elementary years of education. So, unless I parade in front of you and say, "Hey, what do you think?" keep your comments to yourselves.

My privacy as I walk through campus, or anywhere for that matter, should be guaranteed.

Cal Poly, it looks like you need to have a talk with the construction company you employ.

"Boomerang" comes back with a good review even with a serious Eddie Murphy.

According to Paramount Pictures, Eddie Murphy is the number-one comedy star in the world. His worldwide gross of fewer than ten films has exceeded one billion dollars.

On those grounds, audiences come to expect a certain winning style of humor from Murphy. That style was not present in "Boomerang.

From the start, Murphy's character, Marcus Graham, a marketing director for a cosmetic firm, is smooth and classy. When watching the film you keep telling yourself that Murphy is just getting warmed up. Anytime now he is going to turn into the Eddie we all know. But he never does.

It stays the same serious, composed executive listening to the jokes rather than telling them.

Not only is Murphy's character so-so, the other leading characters in the movie are ho-hum.

Robin Givens ("A Rage in Harlem") plays the beautiful, camera-bound Jacqueline. Her character is cool and assertive, almost too natural for Givens.

Halle Berry ("The Last Boy Scout") plays Angela, the cute and innocent artist. Her character is bland and conventional.

David Alan Grier from TV's "In Living Color" plays Gerard, Murphy's timid friend. Grier's talents, unfortunately, are limited with this role. "Boomerang" does, however, come back. Like Murphy's production "Coming to America," it's the many small characters that keep the movie afloat.

What: Murphy's character and other leading characters lack in comedy the surrounding small characters pick up.

One smaller character, Tyler, played by Martin Lawrence of "House Party," is especially successful via two scenes where he pokes fun at racial issues.

Initially, Tyler is offended when a waitress asks if he would like asparagus spears. Tyler takes "spears" offensively.

Later, Tyler points out that African-Americans are even oppressed in the game of billiards because the white ball has to knock the black ball into the hole.

Grace Jones as Strange, Eartha Kitt as Lady Eloise, and Geoffrey Holder as Nelson add tremendous humor and flavor.

Other even smaller parts, Chris Rock as the mail boy Barry T, Tisha Campbell as Yvonne, Murphy's next-door neighbor, and John Witherspoon and Bebe Drake-Mansley, as Gerard's parents are hilarious.

Directed by Reginald Hudlin ("House Party") and produced by his brother Warren and with screenwriters Barry W. Blaustein and David Sheffield ("Coming to America") the movie features a clearly captured plot about role reversal.

The filmmakers cleverly point out the humorous characteristics of men and women in relationships, letting each side portray the typical sexual behavior of the other.

Unlike "Coming to America" where Murphy played several smaller roles that complemented his lead role, here Murphy plays only one full role. "Boomerang" does stay in the air only for its talented filmmakers and small characters.

Like Murphy's production "Coming to America," it's the many small characters that keep the movie afloat.

San Luis Obispo County has several campgrounds that offer a variety of activities.

Lake Nacimiento and Lopez Lakes are popular places for water-skiing, windsurfing, swimming, fishing and hiking.

These areas have nearby campgrounds with services ranging from primitive, meaning no running water, to full hook-ups for RVs.

A representative from Cal Poly's Escape Route suggests these areas for people who like a lot of activity and don't mind other campers.

For those who like a little more seclusion, San Luis Obispo Coast District Chief Ranger Richard Bay suggests Montaña de Oro State Park, located west of Los Osos.

"It's definitely the most beautiful campsite around," he said.

The park features expansive, rolling sand dunes, cliff-top views and a quiet, sandy cove. It offers hiking, fishing, horseback-riding, surfing and hiking, among other activities.

The campground at Montaña de Oro has 50 primitive campsites.

Further up the coast just north of Cambria is San Simeon State Park, which boasts two campgrounds: San Simeon Creek with 115 sites and Watchers with 70.
University honors its top teachers

Professors from nutrition, history, psychology get awards

By Julie Paczeco
Staff writer

NUTRITION, history and psychology are three departments where Cal Poly's most distinguished teachers can be found.

Mary Pedersen, John Snetsinger and Fred Stultz have been selected as the distinguished teachers for 1991-92.

All three professors were selected by an Academic Senate committee, which acts on nominations from students and faculty.

Pedersen, a professor in the food science and nutrition department, is known for her research with fat levels in the blood.

"Before I started teaching at Cal Poly, I did full-time research," Pedersen said. "I didn't like it because I was isolated. Teaching gives me a chance for day-to-day contact with people."

Pedersen began teaching at Cal Poly in 1981 after being offered one of the first positions at Cal Poly that was a combination of teaching and research.

"The combined teaching/research position was ideal for me," Pedersen said. "I love research and have been successful in getting some government grants."

Pedersen said she tries to keep current in the field of nutrition to give her students the best education possible.

"I try to keep the material at a level that is interesting and provide students with knowledge that will be useful," Pedersen said.

Pedersen juggles a teaching career, research projects and motherhood.

"Raising three young daughters, ages 6, 4 and 2, is very challenging when you're trying to balance time between students, research and writing," Pedersen said.

History Professor John Snetsinger was another recipient of the distinguished teacher award.

Snetsinger sits behind his desk in the Faculty Office Building, as former President Dwight Eisenhower sits at him through a picture frame hanging on the wall on the opposite side of his office.

"That picture keeps me motivated to finish an article I'm writing," Snetsinger said.

It may be difficult to find Snetsinger fall quarter of his follow-up research through on his wish to go to Thailand.

"I love to travel," Snetsinger said. "I think during the past seven or eight years I've been to South East Asia at least six times."

Snetsinger encourages students to travel outside of the United States. He has participated in Cal Poly's London Study Program for students at least four times.

"I think I really benefited from my experiences outside the country," Snetsinger said. "I try and bring that into my classrooms."

Snetsinger began his tenure at Cal Poly in 1970 after teaching at San Jose State and Cal State Fullerton for a short time.

Snetsinger felt honored to receive the distinguished teacher award.

"This award comes from the student, and that's the most important thing about it to me," Snetsinger said.

The third recipient, Professor Stultz from human development and psychology, is in Colorado for the summer.

He has been a member of the Cal Poly faculty since 1977 and specializes in lifespan human development.

Each recipient will receive $1,000, which will be presented with a plaque during the next general session of Cal Poly's Fall Conference in September.
