THE NEIGHBOR

My uncle is not yet dead and the last red bloom of summer has spread to take the sun when a neighbor clips it and places the stem in the water of her own crystal vase and offers the beautiful gift at the door. She is welcomed and led up the stairs to the room where he is propped on the bed watching baseball on tv, and he smiles
and wisecracks the old line about doors left open.
She laughs and hands
him the flower.
He reaches to take it,
to place on top of the oxygen machine and that night at dinner she is staring at a cut violet in her centerpiece when she remembers how she held the vase a moment too long, how he almost had to pull it from her hand, so surprised was she

at his forearm, the vessels bulging
blue, and awful the way the whole thing pulsed like a lung, and she thought the word 'nitroglycerin'.
The violet is growing darker, the sound of cars
arriving in the street, when she looks up,
surprised now at the remarkable steadiness of his hand, his kind eyes, and finally she lets go her grip.