

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

First, on behalf of the Paideia team, we would like to extend our thanks to the Political Science Department for its support and guidance of Paideia for the last four years. Without the passion from the department, Paideia would not be possible.

Dr. Elizabeth Lowham, your valuable advice and expertise has been a constant reassurance to Paideia. Not only did you promote and support the journal, but you provided guidance when needed most.

Dr. Matthew Moore, thank you for continuously and generously providing Paideia with your Suggestions for Writing Papers that has certainly elevated our editorial process and the journal itself.

Dr. Shelley Hurt, we are extremely grateful for your constant support and enthusiasm for Paideia, your encouragement has never ceased to motivate us.

Dr. Jean Williams, we deeply appreciate all the excellent authors you connect us with. You have helped the journal continue to have extremely competitive submissions through your excellent recommendations.

Dr. Michael Latner, thank you so much for the outstanding number of student papers that you recommended for publication. We are extremely grateful for your support and numerous recommendations.

Furthermore, thank you to all of the Professors in the Political Science Department for allowing members of Paideia to come speak to your classes, and for posting flyers outside your classrooms. Without this, Paideia would not be able to reach a record amount of submissions this year.

We also extend deep gratitude to the co-founders of the journal, Joi Sullivan and Katie Magnus. Your innovative senior project has become integral in providing students with the opportunity to have tangible representations of their work, and be called a published author. We are extremely grateful for the framework you created to allow Paideia to succeed.

Ashley Stephens and Kat Spade, you were both incredible mentors throughout the last two years of publication. Your advice and mentorship while Executive Editors, gave us the confidence needed to successfully produce this year's volume.

Additionally, thank you to Denise Curtis and Sara Wilkinson for all their help throughout the logistical needs of Paideia.

Erik Salholm, we are grateful for your assistance in creating and editing the Paideia website, making it truly impressive.

To the Political Science Alumni Advisory Board, thank you for aiding us in connecting the journal to alumni, we are deeply grateful for the unwavering enthusiasm you have provided.

Cal Poly's Graphic Communication Department and Lorraine Donegan, we would be lost without your assistance in connecting us with extremely talented graphic designers. Natalie Jones, your speed and talent were critical in the success of Paideia, and with your help, the journal achieved a beautiful, polished design.

To the student authors that are published in this year's volume, we extend our congratulations. Your papers were a delight to read and tackled extremely important topics that we hope will provide others with a deeper perspective.

We are so appreciative of the featured Cal Poly Alumni who graciously allowed us to interview them and provided current students with valuable insight as to the success they can achieve with a political science degree. You all served as wonderful models for what political science students can achieve.

Lastly, we are extremely thankful to our faculty advisor Dr. Anika Leithner. In addition to all you do on and off campus, you were able to dedicate critical time to answering our questions and helping guide the journal to success. You gave us the help we needed to navigate around the complexities of producing a journal, and were always a source of support and insight.
