REPORT:
Mobilization for Animal Rights:
Conference '81
Ocean City, Maryland
October 10-12, 1981

Animal rights activists from the United States, Canada, and Britain met recently in Ocean City, Maryland to establish a national coalition which will serve as a clearing house of information and as a coordinating structure for the animal rights movement as a whole in the United States and Canada. The formation of this coalition represents a major step forward in the forging of a consolidated political movement on behalf of animals. In the past the animal rights movement has suffered all too often from fragmentation and duplication of effort. The purpose of Animal Rights Mobilization (ARM) is to overcome these problems by providing a solid base for unified, coordinated, national campaigns.

The conference was organized by the Animal Rights Network and was attended by over two hundred activists representing some thirty-five organizations. It marked a continuation of the effort begun last July with the international Action for Life conference in Allentown, Pa., and included similar educational efforts. Training workshops were conducted by experienced animal rights activists on such key topics as vivisection, factory farming and vegetarianism, domestic animal problems, hunting, and trapping. The program also included talks by such prominent animal rights activists as Clive Hollands, Jessica Kespohl, Kim Stallwood, Robert Brown, and Richard Morgan.

On the whole, however, the conference was marked by a greater emphasis on tactics and strategy, and less concern with ideology and moral issues. Not only did the program include, as in the previous conference, workshops on research and the use of the Freedom of Information Act, legal protection, demonstrations and rallies, lobbying, and publications and use of mass media, but fully half of the time was devoted to plenary sessions in which the details of the Animal Rights Mobilization coalition were worked out. The quarrels which took place were thus predominantly of a pragmatic rather than a philosophical nature.

In spite of crowded conditions and an extremely heavy schedule of events, however, the conference participants managed to arrive at a democratic resolution of all the principal issues concerning the establishment of the coalition. Coordinators were elected and four initial task forces were established. These are: bloodsports, mobilization against laboratory experimentation, legislation and lobbying, and use of mass media. All organizations which are in general agreement with the aim of liberating animals from exploitation and abuse will be invited to join the coalition and to participate in the task forces.
