Cal Poly joins education, research consortium
Cal Poly has been admitted to a national network of universities that have partnered with a number of federal agencies to promote education and research in the management of natural and cultural resources. The Californian Cooperative Ecosystem Studies Unit (CCESU), part of the national CESU network, recently welcomed Cal Poly and two other CSU campuses -- Humboldt and Chico -- to the consortium. The California CESU already includes all nine University of California campuses and the CSU campuses at Fresno, San Francisco and Los Angeles. “Membership in the CESU will open up many new avenues to applied research funding and support for our educational programs, not only for the Natural Resources Management Department, but for other departments and programs across campus that engage in instruction and research related to the network’s interests,” said Doug Piirto, head of the Natural Resources Management Department. Piirto expects opportunities to develop quickly with the U.S. Forest Service and the National Park Service, which have expressed interest in working with Cal Poly because of its considerable expertise in forest science and natural resources management.

Campus ‘building coordinators’ assigned

Individuals throughout campus have been assigned as “building coordinators” to assist in both non-emergency and emergency situations. The coordinators serve as liaisons between building occupants and Facility Services, and in the event of a drill or an emergency, they help evacuate campus buildings. In an emergency, building coordinators report injuries and probable locations of trapped individuals to campus authorities, and, if the Emergency Operations Center is activated, they provide situation updates. In an emergency, look for individuals wearing bright green vests. For a list of building coordinators and more information about their job, visit the Web at http://www.afd.calpoly.edu/AFD/emergency/bldgcoordinator.html. For more information about the building coordinator program, contact Vicki Stover, associate vice president for administration, at vstover@calpoly.edu or ext. 6-2258. Remember: If you hear a building evacuation alarm, leave the area immediately. If you’re outside a building, do not enter. In the classroom, instructors should direct their students to immediately move away from the area. However, do not wait to be told to leave. Waiting for emergency personnel could put you and them at risk.

UPD to participate in ‘Click it or Ticket’ campaign

The University Police Department is participating in this year’s annual “Click it or Ticket” seat belt safety campaign. As part of the campaign, from Monday through Sunday, May 8-14, the UPD will monitor the number of drivers who don’t buckle up. During the actual campaign, from May 15-June 4, officers will ticket those who don’t -- no matter how short the on-campus drive. The UPD will again monitor drivers on campus the following week, June 5-11, to see if seat belt use rates go up. “We’re trying to remind students, faculty and staff that buckling seat belts should be automatic,” said UPD Chief Bill Watton. For more information about the “Click it or Ticket” campaign or vehicle restraint laws, contact Sgt. Carol Montgomery at ext. 6-6682.
