Spreading the word about CSU’s impact

By Chancellor Charles B. Reed

Those of us who work in and around California State University campuses know that the CSU has a major impact on the citizens and communities of California. We received tangible proof of that fact last fall when the CSU released a comprehensive study of the impact of the university system. That study showed a dramatic and unparalleled impact on the economic, social, intellectual and cultural life of all of California.

During the past year, we have been working hard to share that information throughout our communities. For instance, we have begun hosting a series of informational forums with industry leaders in the fields to which the CSU supplies the majority of California's workers. We held an agricultural industry forum at Fresno State in February, an entertainment industry event at Cal State L.A. in April, and a tourism/hospitality industry forum at Cal Poly Pomona in June. Future industry panels for fields such as engineering are in the works. We also have held briefing sessions with Latino and African-American community leaders, and we are planning additional briefings for those communities, as well as briefings for Vietnamese and Chinese communities, in both Southern and Northern California.

But our best advocates for the message about the CSU impact continue to be you, our employees. To that end, I want to encourage you to visit the CSU's new impact Web site, www.calstate.edu/impact. This site provides complete information from the impact report, organized by industry and by campus, as well as specific tools such as talking points and presentations that you can use to learn more about your campus and the CSU, and to share with others in your formal and informal discussions.

The more our message gets around the state, the better equipped we are to fulfill our mission as a university. For example, as our policymakers in Sacramento continue to hammer out the final details on the CSU's budget, they need to hear about the CSU's contributions. When they understand that an investment in higher education is an investment in California's future -- and when they truly understand the massive impact that the CSU has on California's economy -- we will be better positioned to carry out our important work for California's students.

I want to thank you once again for helping to make the California State University such an outstanding institution of higher education. Your commitment to the CSU and its mission is what allows our university to make a difference for California and its students.

Professor makes headlines with new research
Archaeology Professor Terry Jones is making headlines with his research into possible contact between ancient Polynesians and California’s Chumash Indians. Jones co-authored an article with linguist Kathryn Klar of UC Berkeley, set to be published in the July edition of archaeological journal American Antiquity. Jones and Klar’s research and assertion that Polynesian explorers reached North America nearly 1,000 years before Columbus has rekindled debate over the theory. University awarded grant to help K-12 teachers
The university received a $50,000 state grant to help K-12 teachers use the arts in their classrooms. The California State University Commission on the Extended University awarded the grant to Cal Poly Continuing Education and University Outreach and the Liberal Studies Department. The funding will enable the two campus entities and the College of Liberal Arts’ Central Coast Center for Arts Education to team up to develop and offer six online professional development courses for teachers starting winter quarter 2006. The arts in education courses, now in development, will be created specifically for new teachers, teaching artists and practicing teachers who want to upgrade skills and knowledge in arts education.
