"Hard Work" Keeps 1957 Probability Students in College

"About half the probability engineering students admitted a year ago are still enrolled this year," said James C. Anderson, assistant to C. H. Rice, Cal Poly Dean of Engineering.

Anderson went on to explain that the students are faced with a difficult situation involving both academic and personal challenges.

"In fact, it is estimated that the number of students who complete the program is only about one-fourth of those who begin," Anderson said.

Studies have shown that the probability of a student completing the program is directly related to the number of units taken per term. Anderson cited the example of a student who takes 12 units per term. In this case, the probability of completing the program is approximately 75%.

"However, if a student takes 16 units per term, the probability of completing the program drops to 50%," Anderson said.

The difficulty of the program is further compounded by the high cost of tuition. Anderson estimated that the cost of tuition for a full-time student is approximately $15,000 per year.

"This cost is a significant burden for many students," Anderson said.

In conclusion, Anderson emphasized the importance of hard work and dedication in the success of probability students.

"It is clear that the students who succeed are those who are willing to put in the necessary time and effort," Anderson said.
