Editorially Speaking:

Graceful Students

One thing about Cal Poly students, they can really roll with the punches. Notice how gracefully they took the insults in the last editorial.

Half of you probably thought SOMEBODY'S DEAD was an obvious punch line, and didn't bother to read it. We can't argue with you there because, obviously, it was an obituary.

If the students who can't see beyond their coffee cups in El Corral took to heart the recent National Librarians Week motto, "Wake Up And Read," there might be a little more interest in books and the other publicity material. Less than one quarter of the student body is aggresive. But if Mustangs still seems to be more interested in cows and horses than in electronics, architecture, M.B.A.

Pictures of Poly Royal and Homecoming princesses are still taken with the air of holding a sheep or a pig. At today's Cal Poly, it would be more fitting if they had them buy the farm. A drafting table or holding a technical complexion.

We have nothing against angles, except that they have more in Greece around here than their numbers deserve. We'd like to see them and their affairs relegated to a level more in keeping with their status as the weakest division at Cal Poly.
Fencers Drill Weekly; Want to Build Club

The fencers and stick of fencing blades handles another swordmanship lesson for Cal Poly students Monday and Friday afternoons at the Gymnasium main.

The fencing club was organized in the fall of 1964 by Clifford Clemons, Electronics Instructor, but the teacher is Neil Honeychurch, a Mechanical Engineering student. Honeychurch started fencing at Sacramento Junior College five years ago and in the army had a group of instructors for fun. Asked if he hoped that the school would take an interest in the sport, Honeychurch assented, "Dear right, I've had several people ask about it as gym training and it might even develop into an intercollegiate sport."

Dan Bishop, one of the new students, admits that the glamour and romance of the age old sport is in a keen crossing point. George Grebelman, another of the sentiment, "Well, I'd like it for the physical and coordination training."
