More nations join Games boycott

Two more communist nations dropped out of the 1984 Summer Olympic Games on Friday, but the head of the international competition promised to "fight to the last minute" to bring the Soviets and their allies to Los Angeles.

Claiming the United States was "undermining the Olympics with political maneuvers," Vietnam on Friday fell in line behind Bulgaria and East Germany in joining the boycott, according to the Voice of America radio.

Mongolia, stepping up what had been a one-way ritual of communist defections, also dropped out Friday, according to Tass, the official Soviet news agency.

Other Soviet allies, including Poland, Mozambique and Cuba, hinted they would follow their comrades in staying away from the Games. The Czechoslovakian ambassador to Mexico said his country would pull out; there was no confirmation from Prague.

Duarte named Salvadoran leader

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Moderate Jose Napoleon Duarte emerged Friday as the winner of El Salvador’s presidential election, the second of only two long-time candidates to win.

He devoted most of his speech before the National Assembly Tuesday to "fight to the last minute" to bring the Soviets and their allies to Los Angeles.

"If the people on the people to help me destabilize that machinery they have been building," he said. "I call on the people to help me destabilize that machinery they have been building." Duarte said in a telephone interview.

"We have a free conscience that we won the elections cleanly without dirty tricks," said Joan Duarte Navas, Duarte’s daughter and private secretary. "With God’s help, my father can bring peace to the country."

"We are not aakk for a hantkmt—but a fair shake and a fair share of the political machinery," he said.

"The idea of someone trying to censor the program would be of more concern than the views that are expressed," he added. "The danger exists when we become afraid of the expression of others’ views."

Duarte charged that ARENA’s attitude "is helping the guerrillas cause trouble. First they said we were communists and now they say we’re from the CIA."

"We have a free conscience that we won the elections cleanly without dirty tricks," said Joan Duarte Navas, Duarte’s daughter and private secretary. "With God’s help, my father can bring peace to the country."

San Salvador told the balloting a “farce” and said it would not accept the results.

Suicide squads to form in Libya

TRIPOLI, Libya AP— Libya said Sunday its forces had tracked down and killed the leader of last week’s reported attack on Moammar Kadafi’s barracks, and took 10,000 Libyans gathered under a blast sun to shout their support of Kadafi’s regime.

The official JANA news agency said the leader of Tuesday’s attack, Wajdi Alshwefadi, hid in a residential building in Tripoli, but was shot and killed the leader of last week’s reported attack on Moammar Kadafi’s barracks, and took 10,000 Libyans gathered under a blast sun to shout their support of Kadafi’s regime.

Hey, did you finally hit someone with that water balloon?

Yes, I haven't forgotten how to have fun around here! I hit John right in the face, ha!

Well, you forgot something, what's that?

John is the new R.A.

Last Word

Plain food can’t spice life like pizza, beer, slimy escargot

Oh, that unmistakable aroma of pepperoni, mushrooms, cheese and dough. Put those ingredients together and what do you have? Pizza, please. Pizza. That delectable delight makes me do all kinds of things.

The first bite makes me reminisce. Back in New York, we'd go to Sustenans, Da Pahla or Danzo's to get the best taste in town. Nothing tantalised my taste buds more than a thick, chewy pizza from one of those spots.

The second bite makes me upright.
For 9½ years I have earned my dough at Shakes' Pizza Parlor. The word pizza doesn't make me upright. It's everything associated with it. For example, the hundreds of screaming baseball teams, the video addicts that constantly ask for five quarters after handing you a dollar bill, etc. etc. etc.

The third bite makes me sad.
Since I graduate in June, it looks like my pizza career just might come to an end. Yeah! No more pepperoni pizzas, no more screaming kids, no more Laurel, no more Jackie, no more Cindy, no more laughs. Hmmmmm. That's the problem with working so long in one place— you make some very good friends that you know you'll miss. But life goes on, even in the pizza business. I've sure had some terrible times that I'll never forget.

And the fourth bite makes me thirsty, so I drink a beer.
Oh, that unmistakable taste of cool, refreshing beer. Beer makes me do all kinds of things.

The first gulp makes me reminisce. Back in New York, we'd go over the Canadian border and get cases of Molson's Tower or John Labatt's Extra Stock. Then we'd fill up the gas tank because it's so much cheaper over there. A stop for fish and chips at a little restaurant in Ontario was inevitable. That night the case emptied and the procedure was repeated the next day.

The second gulp makes me thirsty for another gulp.

The third gulp makes me thirsty for another, the fourth another, the fifth yet another.

Well, I never said beer was as thought provoking as pizza. After getting upright, sad and thirsty, I just drink and ice cold beer and forget about everything—what a great combination.

Author Karen Rivas is a senior journalism major and Mustang Daily staff writer.

When scanning the menu of an exotic restaurant, I never cease to be amazed how friends and family who I am dining with can order the same old, same old thing.

While dining at a Greek restaurant last month, I ordered grape leaves as a chorus of "think-think-think" echoed from my family. I then prepared myself for an uneventful evening.

Dining is an experience to subject the taste buds to new textures, new flavors, no matter how pungent, and to new limits, no matter how bizarre.

Several years ago in a French restaurant in New York, my grandmother and I ordered escargot for appetizers. The waiter brought us six elegant snail shells arranged on a small plate. I positioned my miniature pitchfork and succeeded in placing a black olive-stained snail in my mouth. Although the taste and texture was similar to a clam sauteed in butter and garlic, I was reminded of its true identity when looking down at an empty snail shell on my plate.

I only finished two escargots, but my curiosity was well fed.

Ordering ice cream can also tell a lot about a person. Have you ever gone into a shop where there were more than 31 flavors and your friend or lover orders vanilla? You should introduce them to the snail in the shell since their reactions to new things are the same.

Art students create whales for local museum

by Michael Marter

Two Cal Poly art majors now have an intimate vision of the California Gray Whale. Through their efforts on their senior projects, they hope to bring this vision to many others.

Catharine Lynch and Julie Slinger are painting a lifesize mural of two California Gray Whales at the Morro Bay Natural History Museum. The mural depicts an underwater scene of a mother and calf and measures 10 feet by 55 feet. It is located in the Almay Exhibit room of the museum.

Lynch and Slinger did not know each other before their project began, but they both considered murals as senior projects. Coincidentally, art professor Bob Reynolds, who has also painted a mural for the museum, was contacted by the museum and asked if he knew of any students who would be interested in painting a mural. Robertson introduced Lynch and Slinger and the design process began.

Although their design ultimately had to be approved by the museum board of directors and had to have a natural history theme, Lynch and Slinger were allowed to do whatever they wished. After considering many designs, the pair chose California Gray Whales because they are a dominant aspect of Morro Bay and California natural history. Lynch and Slinger said, they felt Whales were perhaps underemphasized at the museum.

"Rather than a totally scientific drawing we wanted something naturalistic—so you could feel you were in there with them," said Lynch. "The more we thought about it, the more exciting it became," said Slinger.

The pair started the project at the beginning of the Spring Quarter and have worked every Friday since. They hope to finish the project and not exceed their $250 budget by the end of the quarter.

junior Architectural Engineering major.

"We want to hand over our selection to President Baker by June 8," said Green, "but if we're not satisfied with any of the candidates, we will ask to extend the selection process into next year."

The consultative committee is composed of eight faculty members and one student. It consults with liaison representatives who are professionals in the fields of Architecture, Construction, Architectural Engineering, Landscape Architecture and City and Regional Planning, and one alumni representative.

In addition to Wasserman, candidates for the dean's position are Mario Schack, professor of Architecture at Temple University; Sam Areni, the acting dean of Architecture at UCLA; Charles Rush, professor of Architecture at the University of Oregon; Thomas Galloway, professor of Architecture at the University of Rhode Island; Day Ding, professor and chairman of Architecture at the University of Rhode Island; John Knowles, professor of Architecture at Temple University; William Howard, professor of Architecture at the University of Kansas; Day Ding, professor of Architecture at Cal Poly. "Tank" tries to combine the fantastic with the realistic

Blame 'Rio' for funny love-tangle film

Caine's wife, (Valerie Harper), deddee to go to Club hoedown squaredance. Ruming she is in love with him. Apart from a large think about is his wife. But Jennifer helps him partners get switched around more times that at a hoedown.

The story reflects a soap opera scene as base in the South and brings with him his wife, son, and personal Sherman tank. Realistic, right? Garner immediately goes up against the local law enforcement. The result of the movie is devoted to the conflict between Garner and the local sheriff, played convincingly by J.D. Spradlin.

Garner himself is a man in conflict. He wants the old ways—the honky-tonk type bar where a man can sip his drinks in peace and the old Army where everyone was one big family. He gets instead discos and problems within his unit that aren't always kept within the unit.

The film tries for realism by presenting social issues like child abuse in a subplot, but it doesn't really work. This scene for me raised more questions than it answered. It struck me as too fantastic, but maybe people are looking for fantasy these days.

Jennifer becomes somewhat of a nuisance to Caine, although he admits mutual affection. The last thing he wants is for Victor to find out about their relationship. But the inevitable happens after Victor searches the clubs for a man Jennifer has admitted being emotionally hurt by. He asks Caine's help in searching, and of course, since he is such a good friend, Caine goes along with the manhunt.

"Blame it on Rio." starring Michael Caine, was pretty solid. The laughs begin as Caine tells, rather unenthusiastically, the tale of his trip to Rio. The public is invited to an opening reception at the Galerie hours are Monday and Tuesday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The Galerie is closed on holidays.

The last half of the film, where Gamer employs his tank, is pretty fantastic. It reminded me of "Smokey and the Bandit" in a way—the good guys trying to outsmart the corrupt Southern sheriff, and the idea almost works.

The last half of the film, where Gamer employs his tank, is pretty fantastic. It reminded me of "Smokey and the Bandit" in a way—the good guys trying to outsmart the corrupt Southern sheriff, and the idea almost works. Some members of the audience around me really enjoyed the last half of the film, so it can't be all bad. It struck me as too fantastic, but maybe people are looking for fantasy these days.

All in all, "Tank" is a fun film, if you can overlook a few flaws in the plot. The acting is good and the dialogue is funny in certain spots. If nothing else, it's a good bargain night film or a good excuse to get away from studying.

The conflict centers around Jenilee Harrison, who plays a prostitute. Garner defends her against a deputy and the sheriff takes it personally. Before the conflict is resolved, Garner's son is arrested by the sheriff on a trumped-up drug possession charge and put to work on the county farm.

Victor starts accusing a lot of innocent men of hurting his daughter's feelings and finally Caine reluctantly lets his friend know he was the emotional manipulator.

The humor in the movie is excellent. Michael Caine's straight-faced humor coupled with the antics of Joseph Bologna and Valerie Harper make for a very enjoyable film.

Poly nine loses sweep to Matadors, NCAA playoff spot

by David Kraft
Staff Writer

When the Cal Poly Mustangs look for reasons why they failed to make the NCAA Division II baseball playoffs, it will be easy to sight a season-ending sweep at the hands of Cal State Northridge. After all, the Matadors delivered the fatal blow to Mustang post-season hopes.

However, the root of the problem goes much deeper than that. Cal Poly had its last nine games at home, including six against their closest conference opponents: Northridge and Chapman. The Mustangs simply failed to capitalize on a golden opportunity.

Cal Poly lost all three games to Chapman, then took two of three from Cal Poly Pomona, but this weekend's play put the final nails in the coffin. Northridge took both ends of a doubleheader Friday night by scores of 13-9 and 8-5 in eight innings, and then for good measure won Saturday's season finale 8-3.

So, instead of the Mustangs squeaking in for a final playoff berth, Northridge nabbed the second spot in the west. The Matadors will take on Chapman in a five-game series to determine the best in the west. U.C. Davis, which won the Northern California Baseball Association title, is left out of the eastern regional, but could pick up a berth elsewhere.

The three-game sweep ended a bitter month for head coach Steve McFarland and his Mustangs. Cal Poly ended the year by losing 11 of 13 to finish third in the CCAA at 18-16, 7-7 overall. Chapman won the conference at 22-7 while Northridge finished 20-9.

In Friday's opener, pitching let the Mustangs down and they couldn't recover with the bats. Northridge scored five runs in the first inning, but Cal Poly put three on the board to lead 1-3 after winning 13-9.

On Saturday. Mustang hurler Greg Gilbert conceded three games to conference foe CS Northridge. The losses shattered Poly's hopes for an NCAA playoff berth.
